

WOODSTOCK REVISITED: WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

TV's giddiest guest,
Charles Nelson Reilly

The woman who checks
15,000 consumer items
for your safety

High seas violence
to save the whales

AUGUST 20, 1979 • 75¢

People

WHY FARRAH SPLIT

'I am confused
and frightened,'
she says of her separation from

'We're carrying on the spirit'

No one summed up the spirit of slapstick anarchy and antic liberation at Woodstock better than Wavy Gravy. Wavy (real name: Hugh Romney), leader of New Mexico's famed Hog Farm Commune, was the Festival's free-spirited emcee, good-humor man and chief bouncer—and he has been doing the same ever since. "We are carrying on the spirit of Woodstock," he says of his fellow Hog Farmers, who ran a festival in Arizona last month. "There were 10,000 folks there," he reports. "We set up a granola kitchen, and there was a tent city."

The commune is based in Berkeley now—it operates a telephone answering service and organic grape farm—and, at 43, Wavy is much the same. He still has the same wife he had then (though she's changed her name from Bonnie Jean to Jahanara), and he's trying to build a better world for their son, Howdy Dogood Gravy, 7—in his fashion. "We're going to launch the Nobody-for-President Campaign in 1980," he reports. Their slogan: "Nobody's perfect." □

Wavy Gravy (above, at Woodstock) has remained as blithe a spirit as ever at subsequent festivals (left).